Law Faculty's Scholarly Productivity Rated High

Ira Mark Ellman, a member of the law faculty at Arizona State University, has recently published a study (33 J. Legal Educ. 681) measuring and comparing law school faculties' scholarly productivity. The process involved the compilation of a list of 23 law journals, primarily by reference to a 1976 study done by the American Bar Foundation of the frequency with which various journals were cited by courts and scholars. Faculty articles and pages appearing in those journals between September, 1979 and June, 1982 were counted, aggregated by school and compared.

In that comparison, the University of Kentucky College of Law faculty ranked 30th in total pages published in the journals surveyed. When corrections were made for faculty size, the school's ranking rose to 25th. (There are approximately 170 ABA accredited law schools currently in existence.)

A summary of Professor Ellman's study appeared in the Fall, 1983 issue of the Arizona State University College of Law alumni magazine.

Garvey a "standout" in top U.S. legal post

Cleve Gambill, former assistant U.S. Attorney, was settling into his new office at the Department of Interior a few months ago when he got a call from John Garvey, his old next-door neighbor from Lexington who had also moved to Washington.

"John asked me if I were busy, and he told me to come over and see him. He said he was arguing a case before the Supreme Court at 10 o'clock," Gambill said.

"When I got to the court, there was a guy whom I'd last seen working in his garden now standing in the courtroom in a formal morning coat."

As for Garvey's performance in a case about Social Security disability benefits, Gambill said his former neighbor "was perfect . . . he was totally prepared."

Garvey, 34, who is on leave from his professorship at the University of Kentucky College of Law, has one of the most coveted legal jobs in the country—that of assistant solicitor general.

Mineral Law Center Receives Grants

Director David C. Short has announced the receipt by the Mineral Law Center of a $27,000 grant from the A. T. Massey Coal Company and related companies for scholarships and research. The award was announced by chairman of the UK Board of Trustees William B. Sturgill at the Center's 1983 Mineral Law Institute, held at the College in October.

The Center announced in August the establishment of a fellowship in mineral law, which will carry an annual $5,500 stipend. It will be funded by the UK Institute for Mines and Minerals Research.

Work in progress includes the first handbook ever published on Kentucky mineral law. It will contain about 40 articles on subjects ranging from coal contracts to acid rain. Managing editors David Short and Rick Thomas '82, a mining engineer, expect the book to deal with state issues of coal, oil, gas and other minerals. It will feature articles by leading practitioners from diverse experiential backgrounds.

Professor Short has co-authored with Professor John Batt and Barbara Lovan '84 an article entitled "Encouraging Advances in Mining Reclamation Practices: An Analysis of the Experimental Practices Provision (Section 711) of the Federal Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (SMCRA)," in the National Coal Issue, 1984, of the West Virginia Law Review. He is a trustee at large of the Eastern Mineral Law Foundation, and chairman of the Natural Resources Section of the Kentucky Bar Association.

Dean Robert G. Lawson, Professor David C. Short and UK Board Chairman William B. Sturgill, receive Massey companies grant check from Gary W. Callahan '77, secretary and general counsel.

UK Lawyers' writings featured at book fair

Among the more than 70 authors from Kentucky and around the nation gathered in Frankfort November 19 for the second annual Kentucky book fair were four UK lawyers.

Harry M. Caudill '48 displayed his most recent work, Theirs Be the Power: The Moguls of Eastern Kentucky, published by the University of Illinois Press.

William Cunningham '69 has written a book entitled On Bended Knees: the Night Rider Story, which is a story of the revolt of tobacco farmers in Western Kentucky and Tennessee, 1904-1909. The book contains a number of old photographs of historical landmarks and personalities that played a prominent role in that period. It is published by McClanahan Publishing House, Inc.

Forest Smith '49 has published a memoir to his father entitled Eyes in the Clouds, Feet on the Ground.

Kent Hollingsworth '59, who is active in the horse industry, was there autographing the Swift and the Valiant, the first of a three volume series describing the history of thoroughbred racing in the United States. The first volume deals with the 19th century and 33 of the outstanding horses and racing men of that time.

Dr. Mariam Darus visits UK College of Law

Dr. Mariam Darus, Vice Rector of the University of North Sumatra and a member of that school's law faculty, visited the College September 20 to observe American legal education in action. Sumatra, whose educational system is based on the Dutch model, is one of the most westernized in Indonesia. The city in which the University is located has a population of about 1.5 million.

Garvey a "standout"

deciding which of thousands of cases will be appealed to the high court, writing legal briefs, arguing before the nine justices and reviewing scores of other cases on their way to the intermediate U.S. Court of Appeals.

"I really love this job," Garvey said during an interview yesterday in his Justice Department office, just down the hall from the door marked "ATTORNEY GENERAL."

"You have the realization you're making a real impact instead of dealing with hypotheticals in a law school."

By the time a case makes it to the Supreme Court, a case has been refined to its central legal issue, Garvey said, and there's no argument over the facts.

"Oddly enough, it's a lot like law school, though. We don't deal with facts in law school, we just talk about issues," he said. "And it's interesting because the issues have been resolved differently by different courts."

Nevertheless, Garvey said he still misses Lexington, his home on South Mill Street, and his law school classes. He plans to return to Lexington after another year in Washington.

"I hate big cities," he said during a description of the elaborate, but sometimes penetrable, security surrounding the Justice Department building in downtown Washington.

"Every morning there's a guard at the Ninth Street entrance, and you have to show your government ID," he said. "But a lot of the time, I don't have it—I haven't changed it from my coat pockets—so I just flash my subway card."

After 16 months in Washington, Garvey has argued three cases before the court and has written briefs in about a dozen more. While some are still awaiting decisions, he already can point to at least one personally satisfying victory, in a case about prices in Indiana for Falls City beer.

It may not sound like a federal issue—and certainly not a Supreme Court case—but the high court sided with Garvey and ruled that the Louisville-based brewery could charge higher prices for its beer across the river in southern Indiana.

"I kind of identified with that case because I used to buy Falls City all the time because it was cheap, about $3.95 a case down at Big Daddy's," he said. "But the case did involve a bigger issue, that of price discrimination, which antitrust laws say you normally cannot do."

Garvey has lost a big one, too. He wrote the government's brief in the latest nuclear power case in which the court unanimously held that a state could regulate nuclear plants based on economic interest.

"That was a good example of how you never know what they'll do from the questions asked during the argument," Garvey said. "I thought it went well, and we lost nine to nothing."

Garvey's boss, Solicitor General Rex Lee, called him "one of the superstars."

"He is simply one of the finest lawyers I know," Lee said. "The suggestion that he leaps tall buildings in a single bound is only slightly exaggerated. I've seen it, and he needs a short running start."

Lee, a Reagan appointee, chose Garvey as one of his 19 assistants on a recommendation from his Democratic predecessor, Wade McCree. And he said Garvey was one of his best appointments.

"He has a great sense of humor, he writes well, he analyzes well. He's just a standout."

Alumnus Wendell Cherry Makes $100,000 Challenge

UK College of Law alumnus H. Wendell Cherry has made a $100,000 challenge to his fellow law alumni.

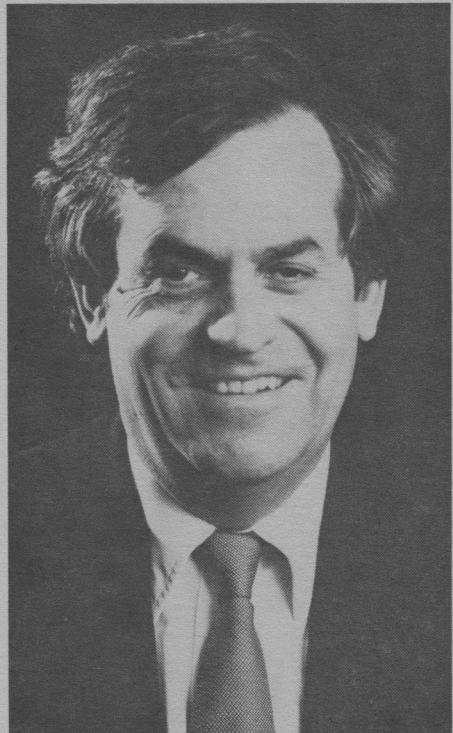

He has pledged to make available to the College a gift of $100,000 to establish the first privately-funded professorship in its history—if an equivalent amount can be raised from alumni and friends to match it. The matching $100,000 raised is to be used to fund a second professorship, according to the terms of the challenge.

Cherry, a 1959 graduate, is president of Humana, Inc., a health care facilities company which has its national headquarters in Louisville. A generous supporter of Kentucky arts, education, and other charities, he has assisted in the past in inaugurating many new philanthropic endeavors, often through challenge gifts.

Endowed professorships—special funds from which income is used to enhance faculty salaries—are the one feature which has traditionally set the UK College of Law apart from the better national law schools with which it might otherwise be compared. Dean Robert G. Lawson has said in reaction to the prospect of two new professorships being established: “This will give us a real boost in our efforts to hold on to our very best young people and, when the occasion arises, recruit experienced teachers of national reputation.”

University Lexington Campus Chancellor Art Gallaher notes: “This development has the most potential of anything I know to make for immediate gains in program quality within the law school. We can now say we are entering the legal education league where we ought to be.”

The dollar-for-dollar match must be obtained through the receipt of ‘new dollars’—gifts made by new donors and amounts given by donors who gave in 1982 which exceed that base. The date on which the challenge gift will be available to the College is July 1, 1984. Only gifts received after October 24, 1983 will count toward the challenge.
